An Active Worker Is Salmon WHO IS OFFERED

Presidency of Oahu College

The Rev. William H. Salmon, M. A., who has been offered the presidency of Oahu College, Honolulu, by the trustees, was only in last December installed as pastor of the South Congregational church, Bridgeport, Connecticut. In reporting that event, the Bridgeport Daily Standard of Monday, December 23, 1901, gave a biographical sketch of the minister.

Mr. Salmon is a Canadian by birth, having been born in the city of London, Ontario. At the close of his boyhood days he went through the Collegiate Institute in London, receiving a complete preparation for entrance into the University of Toronto. However, Mr. Salmon decided to take advantage of a teachers' opening and for several years was identified with mercantile pursuits, but at the same time becoming deeply interested in the Young Men's Christian Association. Taking up association work he became a resident of Newburgh, N. Y., later removing to Milwaukee, Wis., to prepare himself at Marquette academy for Yale university. Among academic honors there he won the gold medal for eloquence. Mr. Salmon entered Yale in 1890 and at the end of his course in 1894 received the degree of Bachelor of Arts. On the social side of his class and college life it is mentioned that he was not only a member of the Junior year fraternity of Alpha Delta Phi, but was also one of the select fifteen of the well known senior society of Wolf's Head, election to which marks a man as one of the most honored, popular men of his class. But it was in the religious activities of Yale that Mr. Salmon became best known, for he became eminent in this work from his entrance to college, being one of the appointive religious committee that had particular oversight of the class in these relations. This was followed by his election as deacon of his class, which was also a supervisory and executive position, while in his senior year he was elected the president of the University Y. M. C. A.

After graduation Mr. Salmon remained in New Haven as the head of the religious work of Yale, his official position being that of general secretary of the association, which he retained for three years. During this period he also pursued graduate work and at its expiration in 1897 he received the degree of Master of Arts for work in the Semitic languages and Biblical literature. It was then that Mr. Salmon decided to leave Yale and to become the traveling secretary of the Australasian Student Christian Union. When this proposed departure became known at Yale a highly commendatory article on his work, written by Henry Sloane Coffin, a former president of the University Association, was published in both the Association Record and the Yale Alumni Weekly. Starting with a small nucleus of members in the Scientific school, the article said, a distinct branch of the work had been built up in that department, with rooms of its own. A few days previous to the publication Mr. Salmon was able to announce Mrs. W. P. Cochran's gift of $10,000 for a lot and building for the exclusive use of this work. A similar work had been started in the three graduate schools of the University. During Mr. Salmon's administration the membership of the association had increased from 500 to over 1200, the annual receipts from $2000 to $5000. An employment bureau for needy students had been established and $2000 added to the endowment fund of the association committees and agencies for reaching members of the incoming classes. In 1891 and 1895 Mr. Salmon visited the associations of all eastern Canada in connection with inter-collegiate work, afterward visiting those of the Middle and New England States. He had been one of the speakers at almost all the large Y. M. C. A. conventions in that vicinity for several years and had contributed many articles to the religious press. His chief work, though, was in building up the Bible study departments of the college and associations.

For three years Mr. Salmon had charge of the Bible study work of the Students' Conference at Northfield. He also conducted a large Bible class for business men in the bridgeport Y. M. C. A. The Yale Daily News editorially paid a high tribute to Mr. Salmon's work. On the eve of his departure from Yale he was tendered a banquet and presented with $100 with which to add to his biblical reference library.

The duties of Mr. Salmon's position as traveling secretary in Australasia were almost purely the supervisory and organizational of the religious life in the universities of that portion of the British Empire. In this work he traveled 15,000 miles by land and 9000 miles by water; he delivered 230 addresses, conducted 38 Bible studies, preached 32 sermons in churches of various denominations. At the end of his secretaryship his work in the Colonies was summed up in a handsomely embossed and morocco-bound testimonial presented to him on his leaving for America.

From Australasia Mr. Salmon began a tour of the world, which extended through the year 1900 and which led him through Egypt, Ceylon, Palestine, and southeastern Europe. He visited the Passion Play at Oberammergau and the Paris Exposition. Returning to Yale, he spent a year in special study, lecturing, preaching and writing voluminous for many religious and secular periodicals. Besides this literary activity Mr. Salmon is author of the following books: Studies in the Life of Jesus, Studies in the Miracles of Jesus, Studies in the Parables of Jesus, Studies in the Bible Study Department at Yale, Systematic and Proprietary Giving, The Culture of Christian Manhood, Among Australasian Students. More than 30,000 of the books on Bible study alone have been purchased and the publishers are still making new editions of them. Besides this Mr. Salmon is author of a missionary hymn for male voices.

The article from the Bridgeport Daily Standard which furnishes the foregoing facts speaks of Mr. Salmon as one of the younger Yale men in that city and concludes thus: "Of such a life and versatility is the new pastor of the South Church. We cannot but feel that, representing as he does a marked type of the younger Christian manhood, and combining as he does a wide experience of men, of various nations and ways of life with the strength and religious training of the University of New Haven, his advent into the religious work of Bridgeport and of the well-known church which has called him, will mark an epoch in the church work of Bridgeport."

Now that Theodore Roosevelt Jr. is really convalescent it will go to tell a story that has troubled the superstitious and amused the materialists about the White House no little of late, says the Chicago Tribune.

Some time ago the fastenings holding in place the portrait of General Grant, which hangs on the wall of one of the first floor rooms, gave way and the huge canvases with its frame fell to the floor. The crash brought several attendants to the scene among them more than one of the negro servants about the house.

With an awe-struck tone one of the old retainers declared that some one in the family would die. He recalled that the falling of the portrait of President Garfield was followed by the death of President McKinley, all of which predicting it at the time.

When the President's young son became ill at Groton, "I told you so" was the constant refrain of the superstitious old negroes about the place. When the servants saw him brought home and on the way to convalescence, they began to doubt the truth of the solemn warning, but there are still those that firmly believe something has to develop after the falling of a President's portrait, and as the young boy slowly wins his way back to strength the superstitious negroes look about for some other victim of General Grant's portrait.—Washington Times.

COMMERCE OF PACIFIC

UNITED STATES HOLDS SPLENDID ADVANTAGES

Gains Made in Trade With the Orient Have Been Marvelous—Manila and Honolulu Strategic Trade Points.

Washington, April 4.—"The Commerce of the Pacific" is the subject of an address by O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, delivered before the National Geographic Society at the Columbia theater in Washington, Wednesday afternoon, April 2. It is only in recent years, Mr. Austin said, that the people of the United States have turned their attention seriously to the consideration of foreign commerce. The development of our own country through the construction of railways and the opening of the interior which followed has occupied the attention of the capitalists and those engaged in commerce and production, but now, with the great development which has followed and the power of producing in excess of the demands of our own population, there is a general desire to find new markets abroad for the products of the field, the forest, the mine, and the workshop. Such markets have already been found in European countries, which are easily accessible and which are the natural market for our surplus foodstuffs and materials for use in manufacturing, but the fact that there exists on the other side of the Pacific a market now consuming a hundred million dollars worth of products per month, or one billion, two hundred millions every year, and chiefly of the kind of goods which the United States produces and desires to sell, makes the question of the commerce of the Pacific an especially interesting one at this time.

American Disadvantages.
Up to this time the United States has been at a decided disadvantage in the attempt to invade the markets of the Orient, because the great commercial nations of Europe lie so much nearer to that market and are provided with a direct means of water communication. The fact that the great producing centers of the United States still lie in the eastern section of the country and that their products must either cross the United States by rail, or travel an enormous distance by water, in passing from the eastern coast to the markets of Asia and the Orient has rendered that market a difficult one for American exporters.

Wonderful Gains Made.
The all-water routes from New York to the Orient are from 2999 to 5000 miles longer than those from London to the great markets on the eastern coast of Asia, being about 12,500 miles against a little over 10,000 miles from London; while the route from New York to the Orient around South America and across the Pacific is 16,000 miles long, the shortest route being half way round the earth at its greatest diameter and that by way of South America and the Pacific two-thirds of the distance around the world. In spite, however, of this disadvantage under which the United States labors as compared with other countries, it has made much more rapid gains in the commerce with the Orient than any other nation, our exports to the Orient having grown from $40,000,000 in 1891 to $115,000,000 in 1901, an increase of 180 per cent; while the total exports were increasing but 50 per cent. Our imports from the Oriental countries increased during the same time from $105,000,000 to $162,000,000, an increase of over 50 per cent, while the total imports of the country were increasing but 10 per cent. An examination of the commerce of other nations with the Orient shows that that of the United States has grown with much greater rapidity than the other countries competing for that commerce. Taking the commerce of the Orient at decennial periods beginning with 1858, the year prior to the opening of the Suez canal, Mr. Austin finds that the imports of those countries show about the same actual increase as those from the United Kingdom, which is much more favorably located at present than are the producing centers of the United States, and that in percentages the gain is, United Kingdom, 50 per cent; United States, over 1000 per cent.

Large Tropical Imports.
Commercial relations between the United States and the Orient should, in Mr. Austin's opinion, be especially close, because of the fact that each section produces articles which the other section requires. Tropical and sub-tropical products have become a very large proportion of the imports of the United States, and are constantly increasing both in quantity and value and in the percentage which they form of the total imports. In the
